Down in Old Virginia.

The Washington correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette writes as follows: The earliest morning hours in a city railway station are not the best to study your fellow human beings from an optimistic standpoint. The commuters come streaming through the iron gates as train after train arrives and disgorges. The employees, gate-keepers, etc., look just as sleepy and cross as they. As the day wears on this aspect will change, the frowns will disappear, and gentleness succeed ill-temper.

In the B. & P. station there is one object of interest in which never lags. It is the brass star in the floor of the ladies' waiting-room that marks the spot where Garfield fell. People familiar with its location carefully avoid stepping upon it, and when speaking of it and the event it commemorates they unconsciously lower their voices, often to a whisper. A colored woman once testified, when sending her son to the House of Refuge for incorrigibles, that his misfortune was all owing to the fact that she had stepped upon that "death star" a few days before her child was born.

The colored woman in attendance can tell you many interesting things about the questions asked about the star, a not infrequent one being, "Who was Garfield?" Another institution in the station is a bureau of information, with the notification: "All questions answered here." A brilliant correspondent thought he would test the concern. He stepped up and asked, "What is the chief end of man?" "To ride on the Pennsylvania railway," was the answer.

Still another attraction is the man who calls out the departure of trains. He reminds one of the Missouri river—no head to speak of, but what a voice! After he had made an extraordinary vocal exhibition the four newspaper men entered the train for Fairfax station, and soon were shipping swiftly along over the famous old Long bridge with the beautiful panorama of the Potomac spread out before them in as fair an autumn morning as ever shown.

At the driving station of historic Alexandria, with its reminiscences of long-departed glory, you have a plain front view of Christ Church, in which are the pews of the Washingtons and Lees, preserved in the condition they were when last occupied by them. Farther down, you catch a glimpse of the Braddock House, in which that officer planned the expedition from which he never returned, and not far away, and in sight, is the building which Ellsworth lost his life almost simultaneously with the death of his assassin. And now you pass fully into the scenes and associations of the great war. Upon the high grounds left and right, as you speed along, are the earth forts, in many of them the embrasures for the heavy guns still to be traced. Your railroad folder tells you that this road was practically one battle-field from Alexandria to Culpeper. It is a pretty country, now, with well kept farms, houses and wide barns, and blooded stock ranging on the pasture slopes, and just now it is particularly attractive in the rich and varied forest hues of autumn.

At the close of the war all this region, and way over to Gordonsville, Culpeper, Brandy Station, Manassas, Bull Run, Chantilly, Gainesville, Vienna and so on up to Ball's Bluff, was a scene of savage desolation, tramped over, fought over, devastated, soaked with blood and full of dead men's bones. That awful harvest has been gathered by reverent hands, and the bones of the fallen rest beneath the peaceful trees of Arlington.

At Fairfax Station we alighted, to take the stage for Fairfax Courthouse, four miles away. The stage looked as though it had seen better days; it couldn't be worse and hold together, and it is possible it dates back to the war as an ambulance. If it does it illustrates the hardships to which the wounded were subjected. It is covered with black oil-cloth and has a "Black Maria" appearance. The driver sits up in front with a tin horn stuck in a socket at his right hand. Into this he blows vigorously to announce to the people his arrival and departure; to the Courthouse people and those along the route he is railroad, expressman, mail man, messenger, telephone and telegraph. From the government he gets a hundred dollars a year for carrying the mails and his charge for the trip is twenty-five cents each way.

We had hardly got under way when the correspondents turned loose their batteries of inquiry upon him. "Fighting around here? Well, I should say. Every inch of the ground in all this region has been fought over. All these plains and slopes were covered with camps for years. The first army here was the Confederate, but after that the yankees were here most of the time. You see that church? That was a federal hospital and headquarters. Right in the road here and in that graveyard across was a lively fight one morning. Two companies of New York cavalry were camped in that yard about the church, and were not watched, as they had no idea that there was a confederate anywhere near, as the yankees had possession of the whole region. But Mosby was pyroon't around, and at break of day, with about a hundred men, rode up on the top of you rise and made a dash right across here for the yankee camp.

"It was so sudden the yankees had no show. Some of them tried to make a stand and got killed, but the best they could do was to jump their horses and take up the road, which was corduroy then." (It is corduroy now.)

"You never saw such a race as that was, with the yankees just more than climbing, and Mosby's men tight to their heels, yelling like devils. I was a small boy, and lived in that house in that clump of trees. I and my brother went down after the fight. The yankees had got away so quickly they nearly went without their hats. There were forty or fifty hats lying around. They were black felt with the brim turned up on one side, with a brass eagle and a black feather."

"I suppose you helped yourself?" "Well, yes, we picked up five or six of them. You see that block away on the side of that tree? Well, that's where the army telegraph wire ran. That's the only one left now."

Fairfax Courthouse is like a pretty extract from ancient history. It is delightful in the odor of memory and reminiscences. Modern ideas and improvements have passed it by, as it has all old Virginia towns that flourished under an imperial and aristocratic regime.

The Fairfax Herald occupies, with its hand-press and single case, a little one-story, two-room building. The rather demolished picket gate in front swings open half way across the footpath beside the red clay roadway of the "main street," and the beaten track around it shows that it has hung in that position for many years.

Across the road are the public grounds and public buildings, just as they appeared in the days of Queen Anne and King George. In the cupola of the quaint old court-house still hangs the bell brought over from England more than 100 years ago, and it still calls the 300 or 400 people of Fairfax Courthouse to court, to church, to law and religion.

Along one side of the grounds, between the courthouse and double-galleried old hotel, now closed, runs the pike, along which streamed the disorganized and panic-stricken hordes of Federal troops after the first Bull Run battle. The pike was fairly made impassable for miles by abandoned accoutrements—cannon, caissons, ammunition wagons, muskets, knapsacks, blankets, and so on, all mixed in inextricable confusion, and among it all the carriages of politicians and others who had come out from Washington to witness the destruction of the Confederate army. That event finally came off, but owing to certain obstinate circumstances it was delayed for several years, and there was a good deal of unpleasantness meanwhile.

Close to the road along which occurred this wild flight now stands an imposing granite monument, inscribed to the memory of the "heroic dead of the Confederacy."

The northern correspondents view this monument with complacency, comment upon its correct proportions, its incorrect spelling of "Zachariah," and, upon the whole, warmly approve of it. The quartette then invaded the funny little one-story, one-room building, which is the office of the clerk of the county. This little room, with its rude deal tables and rusty old fireplace and andirons, is rich in treasures for the historian. As I am not writing ancient history, I will touch briefly upon them. The clerk opened an old-fashioned iron safe and pulled out the original will of George Washington. It is in the careful and painstaking handwriting of the father of his country, and little slips in regulation orthography are plainly in evidence. This will, at the opening of the war, was sent to Richmond for safe keeping, and in the burning of that city at the time of the evacuation it was rescued from destruction by accident, a citizen of Fairfax recognizing it in a pile of rubbish. Urgent application has been made for the exhibition of this document at the World's Fair, but the laws of the State, passed for its protection, are such a chance for its destruction on the movement doubtful, if not impossible.

At the same time, any ordinary burglar could get possession of it in half an hour and hold it for a big ransom. One spark from the fireplace would clear out the whole room in less than half that time.

We read the wonderful will of Geo. Mason, the author of the Bill of Rights, upon which the national and nearly all the State constitutions are based, in which he disposes of his vast estates, his hundreds of slaves, and "my mansion house and seat of Gunston Hall."

These old records, dating back to 1716, are marvels in perfection of binding, heaviness of paper and penmanship, which is as perfect as copperplate. There were great penmen in those days, but then there were no stenographers and typewriters, and penmanship was a recognized and appreciated art. It was in line with the formalities and conventionalities of the times. Nobody cares for penmanship now. The ideas are what we are hustling after.

From the "minute-book" of 1751 I copied this entry: "Ordered that there be erected in the town of Alexandria, a whipping post and stocks; also a ducking stool for the punishment of offenders." The ducking stool was intended especially for women who talked too much.

Here is another "minute" in the elaborate penmanship of the clerk in 1752: "Martha Brown came into court for having a bastard child. Ordered that the sheriff give her twenty-five lashes on the bare back."

The forms and ceremonies of those days are very curious to us in free and easy republican and democratic times. For instance, in the sale of a pew a quitclaim deed had to be given in all the legal vocabulary and signed and sworn to by the vestrymen. Against every vestryman's name was placed a seal and the document recorded in the clerk's office.

On these deeds you find the signatures of Washington, Mason, Fairfax, and so on, each one followed with a funny little red seal, looking very much like a corn plaster. In the court records you find the judges' names signed always as "Gentlemen Justices." An odd little paper is the law regulating licensed inn-keepers and prescribing their prices. It had to be posted in all inns, and any violation of its regulations was visited with a punishment of 75 pounds of tobacco, the same fine that attached to the use of profane language or "walking abroad on the Sabbath day."

This is the tariff of prices as it existed under his Gracious Majesty: "One gallon of rum, 8 shillings; one gallon Nank brandy, 10 shillings; Virginia punch or apple brandy, 6 shillings; New England rum, 2 shillings and sixpence; Arrack, by the quart, made into punch 8 shillings; any red or white wine, by the quart, 2 shillings and sixpence; Fayal and other low wines, 1 shilling and sixpence; London beer, called porter, 1 shilling; English strong beer, 1 shilling and 3 pence; Virginia strong beer, 7 pence a quart; cyder, by the quart bottle, 4 pence; for a gill of rum made into punch, with loaf sugar, 6 pence; with fruit, 7 pence; the same with brown sugar, 4 pence; for a hot diet, with beer or cyder, 1 shilling; for a cold diet, 6 pence. For a gallon of oats or corn, 4 pence; for stabling and fodder 24 hours, 4 pence; for pasturage of horse, 24 hours and one night, 4 pence; for a night's lodging with clean sheets, 6 pence; otherwise nothing. We went into the jail and saw the prisoners in an iron cage which stands in the centre of the room, leaving space for a narrow corridor around it. The whole scene is horribly suggestive of a den of wild animals, even to the odor. All the prisoners were colored. The bright young boy who showed us around instructed us concerning the prisoners in exactly the same way the menagerie man does today among the animals in the Van.

By this time we were all like the democratic party, described in Chicago in 1860, by George William Curtis, "very hungry and very thirsty." We were directed to walk down the road to the last white house (there were three) with a porch, and there we could get dinner. We followed directions, and were welcomed by a lady in the old-fashioned politeness we had met from everybody during the day, and soon were gathered around the table in a cozy home dining-room.

What a feast it was for men cloyed with hotel and restaurant experience! There was the inevitable fried chicken and corn bread—the corn not long out of the shuck and the chickens only an hour or so out of their feathers. There was light and snowy home-made bread, sweet potatoes boiled with "middles," Irish potatoes and mashed turnips. Philadelphia.
